Catalog Course Description:

This course provides a survey of the political, social, economic, and cultural development of the United States from Reconstruction (1865) to the present. Some topics addressed are the socio-political and economic impact of Reconstruction, the American West, capital and labor in the age of enterprise, America as an emerging world power, World War I, World War II, the Vietnam Era, the Cold War, the new world order, Clinton, and the Bush Administration to the present. This course fulfills the American Institutions requirement for the Associate Degree. It is also recommended for all History majors.

Student Learning Outcomes:

Upon successful completion of this course, the student will be able to:

1. Accurately identify and explain the historical facts of a specific historical period or topic.
2. Analyze the causes and consequences of significant historical events/terms as specified by the instructor.
3. Identify primary and secondary sources and then analyze and interpret its content and significance to explain what the source reveals about the historical period in which it was written.
4. Demonstrate an understanding of the historical significance of the topic.
5. Describe, compare, and evaluate historical interpretations (secondary sources) of the period studied, judging them for their relative quality, accuracy, and persuasiveness.
6. Support generalizations with concrete historical evidence and draw relevant conclusions in a written or oral assignment
